My parents dropped me at the school creche as both of them left for work at the SOS in Dharamsala where I grew up. Twenty years or so later the creche still stands there and my parents pass by it daily as they go to their works. It has always been a modest living for our family of four and my college education had added on the already existing financial strain. The first book that I read after the "Famous Five" series was His Holiness, The Dalai Lama's "My land and my people". His autobiography. The book introduced me to myself, to who I was and what do I stand for. The responsibility of being a Tibetan and the burden of being a refugee dawned upon me. My father always used to tell me that the best profession in the world was that of a Tibetan language teacher. The teachers at my school and my parents gave me the inspiration to pursue the profession of a teacher. They instilled in me the urge to serve my own community and dedicate one's time and energy towards the betterment of the future of our country.

After my graduation I want to pursue a degree in Education (B.Ed) to become a qualified teacher and then go back to my own school, back to the same creche, back to where my parents are serving.
